

CHAPTER IV : CONCLUSION

This book provides so many positive things, from history, culture, even politics. It is undeniable that this book is able to change the reader's perspective on humanizing humans, seeing and measuring humans no longer from their race but from their behavior and way of thinking which are the benchmarks.

We can see that all forms of racism are not good and have no strong foundation. Racism will only result in ongoing resentment, which fosters generations with hatred only because of ego interests to be considered the most sacred race and even then it is only a one-sided claim. Hopefully this book can be the beginning of change for future generations, and no more sad cases of racism are found because we believe that differences occur to unite, not to bring down.
